Preface

The collecting of antique firearms is the vocational or avocational pursuit of many men in many different parts of the world. These men will tell you that next to actually acquiring guns their greatest difficulty is finding data about the makers.

The check list of Early American Gunsmiths has been prepared to help collectors learn more about the men who made the arms in their collections. But this volume will also be of much value to genealogists, to people interested in the history of our colonial period, and to those concerned with the evolution of our early trades and industries. No aspect of America's past has been more glorious than our gunsmithing, and it is hoped that this publication will re-emphasize our achievement in a manner that is fitting and unique.

The present study of gunsmithing in America begins with the year 1650, for that is the date of the earliest entry of a gunsmith working in America. By 1850 we arrive at what seems to be a proper terminal point for gunsmithing in America, for by that time the extensive use of interchangeable parts in gunsmithing made this craft one of the first victims of the industrial revolution. The transition from individual to belt line production did not lower the functional qualities of guns, but they were no longer the individual expression of one craftsman.

The establishing of the Colt factory at Hartford, Connecticut provides an excellent example of transition from craft to mass production methods. In the early 1840's there were practically no pistol makers listed in Hartford directories, but in 1850 just a few years after the start of the Colt enterprise the following names appear in a directory: Joseph Arbiter, Francis Bliss, T. J. Burke, James Call, Edwin Chapman, Charles Cooley, George Dunham, Elisha Gilbert, William Green, Peter Hegans, William Henry, Newman King, Robert Knox, Walter Nevers, Amos Peck, A. Pettibone, Benjamin Robbins, Edwin Rider, Albert Phillips, and Solomon Wordsworth. Although all these men were called "pistol makers," it is doubtful that they were producers of individual pistols, as was the case of the earliest makers.

The two centuries between 1650 and 1850 naturally sets certain geographical limitations on the contents of this list of gunsmiths. The eastern seaboard, being the earliest area settled, produces as would be expected, most of the gunsmiths. As one progresses westward their numbers thinned so rapidly that very few gunsmiths are known to have been working west of St. Louis at 1850.

But this volume does not rely for distinction upon the number of names it lists for often length has been achieved at the cost of accuracy and reliability. What this publication does achieve, however, is a considerable number of names proved by documentary evidence. None of the names is derived from loose hearsay or from unsubstantiated written sources. For every name there is at least one source in legal or historical documents. Documents thus cited include; for the most part, tax lists, church records, deeds, wills, newspaper advertisements, patent records, business directories, and the like. The small remaining list of names comes from local histories and publications of a historical nature.

Acknowledgements

This book is not the concept of just one mind, nor are its contents the work of only one person.

Many people, unseen by the author and unknown to him, have helped gather data from documents relating to gunsmithing in America. To them, whoever and wherever they are, I am grateful and offer my sincere thanks.

Of those contributors I know personally I am deeply indebted to Mr. Joe Kindig, Jr., because it was his long search for accurate information about gunsmiths that inspired this book. To it he has contributed throughout the period of planning and writing, generously. I am happy to acknowledge also the timely and inspiring assistance of Mrs. Alfred Cox Prime. Her early gift of a large number of newspaper advertisements dealing with arms encouraged me to look for more and thus make this a book of fact rather than fancy.

A number of other people have made thorough searches of pertinent documents. Miss Beatrice St. J. Ravenel extracted from a large number of deeds and other legal sources the impressive list of gunsmiths from South Carolina. Mr. Robbins H. Ritter examined not only many documents in Maine, New Hampshire and Vermont, but also the Patent Office records referring to the same area. Mr. George Waynick, Jr. sent data on gunsmithing activities in the old settlement at Salem, North Carolina. Mr. Charles Kauffman found much interesting material about gunsmiths in York County, Pennsylvania, and Mr. J. Luther Heisey did similar work in Lancaster County. Dr. Joseph H. Mayer generously lent pictures of the Medad Hills gun and documentary data about him which was abstracted from the Connecticut archives, and Mr. Herman Dean contributed a large number of photographs of arms in his fine collection.

Among organizations which have helped me greatly are the American Antiquarian Society, whose rich resources of information and courteous and obliging staff have added much to the worth of this book, and to the pleasure of compiling it, and Colonial Williamsburg, who at the cost of much time and effort have generously supplied the data about seventeenth and eighteenth century gunsmithing in Virginia.

In other and essential ways I have profited also from the assistance of the following organizations and people:

Introduction

GUN COLLECTING

Long ago some unknown genius conceived the idea that if he could imprison the tremendous explosive power of gun-powder and then direct it through a metal tube, he could send speeding ahead of his explosion a deadly bullet, fatal to man and beast alike. The guns he and his successors made to kill and to compete with on the range have outlived their makers, their users, and their victims, and now are outliving a fourth group, their collectors.

The urge to collect—sometimes to collect objects that are bizarre indeed—is timeless and worldwide and often inexplicable. But the major motives of the gun collector lie deeply imbedded in man's psychological being, his sense of patriotism, his delight in mechanical devices, his love of beauty, and his fascination with death.

The basis and scope of collecting vary as much as men and places vary. Some collections include only European guns, others American; some are of early firearms and others of late ones. Some enthusiasts specialize in military weapons, others in sporting arms, and still others assemble examples from all the classifications.

There are collections of guns of many countries and collections of locally manufactured ones. To be more specific, residents of Ohio are apt to look with most favor upon the products of Ohio gunsmiths, Pennsylvanians upon the achievements of their own craftsmen, and New Englanders upon the objects made in their area. But specialization is often more refined, and a South Carolinian may collect guns made in old Salem or a Pennsylvania concentrate on items from his own York County.

To other collectors it is the mechanics of a gun which is intriguing, so their adventure really does not start until they put the gun on their workbenches. They are fascinated by the action of the mainspring, by the thrust angle of the hammer, by the condition of the rifling, or by the release of the patch-box. A few small screw drivers and a can of penetrating oil are often enough to put a rusted old gun into shooting condition. Other mechanics may go further and spend hours patching a cracked stock, replacing inlays, or reconverting a percussion gun to its original flintlock. Work of this kind makes one not only sensitive to many of the unseen details of a gun and in turn a more competent buyer, but a veteran appraiser of the gun's quality as well. Such mechanics are important members of the firearms fraternity, for without them many good guns would be discarded and forgotten.

Here it might be parenthetically stated that some of these clever workmen do not follow the highest moral code. For, since good guns are rare and costly, unscrupulous mechanics sometimes try to pass off their manufactures and conversions as genuine old firearms. So the amateur collector must be wary of extremely fine guns in a highly finished condition. There are instances where the stock and the barrel were not originally mates, where the lock was transferred from another gun, where a rare maker's name was newly engraved, or the rifling done by a twentieth-century smith. In some cases when a gun is not bought "in the rough" a statement of its age and condition might be a valuable insurance policy against fraud.

A third group of collectors want guns that shoot—and shoot accurately. These people often are unconcerned with the carving on the stock, the engraving on the lock, or the pattern of the patch box. Their attention is concentrated on the size and condition of the bore, the functioning of the hammer, the length of the barrel, or the style and placement of the sights. This group of devotees is very active today and holds muzzle-loading shooting matches in different parts of the country. They also have a regular publication, from which much interesting information can be obtained. Such collectors are naturally very much interested in guns that were made for match shooting, of which some very fine ones are still in existence.

On the other hand, another group, the collectors of military arms, are often interested in the historical background of their guns. For these collectors the establishing of national arsenals was an important move, and for them the names like Springfield, Harpers Ferry, Virginia, and Richmond have important connotations. They can usually identify a musket as to time and place of manufacture by the physical characteristics known to have been incorporated in arms made at a particular arsenal at a particular time. Such different styles are also associated with the wars and battles of our armies, so that gun collecting from their motives can lead to a very thorough knowledge of political history if the collector is inclined to be a student as well.

Whatever the impetus to collecting, the enthusiast usually no sooner owns a gun than he begins to want to find out the name of the man who made it. The "whodunit" of the modern detective story becomes the "who made it" of the gun collector. For he realizes that although a gun may have several desirable assets, one of the most important is the name and identity of the maker. The obtaining of such data can be just as exciting—or more so—as any of his experiences, including actually securing the gun. A specific example may indicate the devious ways a research trail may lead.

LOOKING FOR DATA ABOUT A GUNSMITH

Several years ago I bought in Franklin County, Pennsylvania, a rifle on whose barrel the name "P. Resor" appeared. The mechanical and decorative characteristics of the rifle suggested that it was made late in the eighteenth century in Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, although it had obviously strayed seventy-five miles from home. The movement from Lancaster and Franklin County could not be regarded as unreasonable for many rifles were carried from Eastern Pennsylvania to the frontier. Who was P. Resor? I wanted to know. I wanted to know so much that I began at once to search old legal documents for clues. First I referred to An Index to the Will Books and Intestate Records of Lancaster County 1729-1850; but the name P. Resor did not appear there. A further checking of historical references to Lancaster County gunsmiths brought to light the fact that the famous William Henry of Lancaster had once been apprenticed to Mathius Roesor. The name was spelled differently; but since orthographic variations were common in the early days, the possibility of a connection between Mathius and P. Roesor was very much worth investigating.

Mathius Roesor, according to the Lancaster Moravian Church Archives was born December 25, 1708 and died January 26, 1781. Chronological deductions could lead one to suspect that P. Resor was the son of Mathius Roesor, that he was born about 1840, that he was apprenticed as a gunsmith to his father (as was customary at that time), and that he made the rifle in Lancaster County about 1790. Unfortunately, the Moravian Archives did not mention the name P. Resor, so I abandoned the hunt for the time being.

Several years later one of my friends reported that Catherine the daughter of Joseph Welshans, an early York, Pennsylvania gunsmith, had married a man named Peter Reeser in the First Reformed Church of York, on April 16, 1775. Although the church document did not list Reeser as a gunsmith, there was a great likelihood that he was the same Peter Resor who had presumably lived in Lancaster at about the same time. One may speculate that if Welshans was once apprenticed to a gunsmith in Lancaster he might at that time have formed associations with craftsmen there which led to the marriage of their children.

From speculation, however, one must move on to concrete fact. I discovered again in legal documents that when Joseph Welshans died intestate there was an accounting of his goods and chattels, accompanied by a list of his survivors. Among them was his "daughter, Catherine, wife of Peter Resor, Gunsmith a resident of Elizabethtown, Washington County, Maryland." A check of the records in Washington County showed that Elizabethtown was once the name of the present city of Hagerstown. In the court house records there were three entries under the name Peter Resor/Rezor. A bill of sale executed October 27, 1790 showed that he had paid £53-16-9 for (among other things)

One complete set of smith tools, one feather bed and bedstead, three blankets, two sheets, one corner cupboard, etc., including, a small tract of land in Stony Creek Glades.

In 1791 and 1794 deeds were executed and recorded, indicating that Resor was establishing himself in the town. Unfortunately, none of these documents named him a gunsmith; but it is logical to conclude that he was the same man, for his marriage and previous mention in the interstate document form a reasonable chronological movement.

Resor's Maryland residence thus proved, the assumption of Lancaster manufacture for my rifle seemed much weakened; for since Franklin County, Pennsylvania adjoins Washington County, Maryland, one necessarily had to suppose that Resor made the rifle while he lived in Maryland. There is ample evidence that a gunsmith carries instructions and designs learned during his apprenticeship with him, so the Lancaster County characteristics can readily be explained in a rifle that was produced in Maryland.

Actually, the fact of his residence in Lancaster was the last to be confirmed, because it has only been recently that some tax list of that city have been located listing Peter Razor as a gunsmith working there in 1775 and 1781.

Much was learned about Peter Resor, it is possible that many of the most interesting questions about him will never be answered. How did he come to marry the daughter of a York Gunsmith? Why did he and his wife move to Elizabethtown, Maryland? What became of them after 1794?

As the book goes to press information has come to the author that a Jacob Resor started a gun shop in Cincinnati, Ohio in the early part of the nineteenth century and that he was the son of Peter and Catherine Resor. Jacob Resor was born on January 23, 1784 in Pennsylvania [probably Lancaster] and died January 12, 1845 in Cincinnati, Ohio. The family bible of Joseph Wilson records the death of Catherine Resor as February 2, 1836. Unfortunately, the late life of Peter Resor is still unknown, but it is known that his family carried on the pioneering tradition for from Cincinnati they moved on to Indiana and westward.

A REVIEW OF SOURCES TO SEARCH

It must be evident to the reader that if my experience in securing data about Peter Resor is typical, research can be long and laborious.

Unfortunately for the beginner, there is no precise formula telling where to start and which documents are best in a particular case. But although each case is different there are generalizations about procedures which are applicable to most research problems. I should first like to point out that information about the earliest smiths is the most difficult to locate. Many of them worked in frontier areas where vital statistics were not regarded as important. There were no newspapers to chronicle their wares, and if they did not own property there is little likelihood of the researcher finding a deed or a will. If they attended a well organized church there may be a record of their birth, baptism, marriage or death. Often the very person who seems so important now is the person whose name is missing from the records.

By mid-eighteenth century, however, record-keeping had improved in the hinterlands; and big cities like Boston, New York and Philadelphia one frequently finds several references to a gunsmith, especially if he provided wares for a local or federal government. By 1800 there was further improvement in filing records. Furthermore in many of the larger centers of population newspapers were being published, although often with an unfortunate dearth of local news. By 1850 most records are complete, so there is little difficulty in locating data about craftsmen who worked then or after.

Sooner or later most researchers discovered that one of the best places to start looking for data, if the residence of the person is known, is the county courthouse, provided of course, that the county was in existence when the person lived. Since several new counties were often formed from several older ones, it is always well to know the date when the county in question came into being. It is perhaps best to look first at tax assessment lists. They are usually under the supervision of the county commissioners, but are often incomplete and unorganized unless a conscientious researcher has already put them in order.

If occupations are listed they are doubly useful, for without the occupation the name and the gunsmith cannot be certainly identified. I have found three different people of the same name entered in the tax lists of one county in a single year. Fortunately, in my case the occupations were indicated. Occasionally tax lists are given to local or state historical societies for preservation in their vaults and for accessibility to more people. Tax lists are also published in state archives, together with important data such as correspondence and other business transactions between state officials and gunsmiths. All sources of information considered, I should say that tax lists are one of the most fruitful and convenient aids to the researcher.

In addition much data can be secured from wills, deeds, and inventories and from probate records of the courthouse. There are often indexes of the names filed there, but the researcher should not forget that there are sometimes variations in spelling of the name of the person referred to in these documents. Other practical information included is an enumeration of the person's real estate and personal property and of his survivors, names which often facilitate the tracing of ancestors and descendants.

Another very interesting experience for the scholar is the quest for data relating to gunsmiths in early newspapers. If the search need not be hurried, one should examine every page of every newspaper. Sometimes, however, only a spot check is possible and just a portion of each year is examined, or a whole year can be covered at several year intervals. There is in many cases an added advantage in examining newspapers closely, for one frequently finds unsuspected data that is sometimes more valuable than that which one is primarily seeking. Old newspapers are found in a variety of places, such as local newspaper publishing offices, the library, and the historical society; in the state historical society and in large collections of the Congressional, Harvard University and the American Antiquarian Society libraries. For a complete coverage of what is available one should refer to A History and Bibliography of American Newspapers 1690-1820 by Clarence Brigham.

The thorough researcher must not fail to consult another source, church records, which can be very useful, although only in rare cases are they well organized and available to the public. They not only give dates of birth and death but sometimes provide a short biography of the person in question. The most useful records of this type that I have discovered are those of the Moravian Church.

The enthusiast in search of information about the gunsmith's personal life will find letters frequently provide much data. Some of these communications have been preserved in files of public officials. Many relate to the procuring of ordnance by the federal government in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. They are often quite informative on the quality and cost of arms, on government inspection practices, in the styles that were bought, and on the time of delivery. Other personal records are an occasional diary, birth certificate, ledger entry or private writing. However, such repositories as these must be regarded as incidental for they rarely contain much that is useful for such a specialized study.

HENRY HARRINGTON
Southbridge, Massachusetts

IMPROVEMENT IN FIRE-ARMS

Specification forming part of Letters Patent No. 297, dated July 29, 1837.

To all whom it may concern:

Be it known that I, Henry Harrington, of Southbridge, in the county of Worcester and Commonwealth of Massachusetts, cutler, have invented a new and useful Improvement in Fire-Arms, called "Harrington's improvement in Guns, Pistols, and Cannon;" and I do hereby declare that the following is a full and exact description thereof.

The exterior barrel, of convenient bore and length, resembles the gun-barrel in common use. The interior is filled with several small barrels or tubes, each of the diameter of bore suited to receive one shot or ball of the size intended to be discharged. These small barrels, extending in length from the muzzle downward to a powder-chamber sliding into the lower end at the breech, are soldered or brazed together, and being arranged so as to fill the inside of the exterior barrel are fixed in it by being soldered or brazed. The tubes or small barrels may be made also by drilling through a solid barrel or bar of metal.

In the breech or lower end of the barrel is a mortise, made through the same from the upper side, as the gun lies leveled horizontally, to the underside, to receive a powder-chamber. This chamber is made nearly square, is exactly fitted to the space made by the mortise, and slides therein. On the upper surface, as it sits in the barrel, is a small projection, to prevent it from falling through, and a tube or pin, with a hole drilled through it, to receive a percussion cap, which communicates with the hollow of the chamber under. The front plate of this chamber has holes drilled through it to receive the shot or balls, corresponding exactly with the openings or bores of the small barrels. These holes in the front plate of the chamber are made slightly tapering, so that the opening into the chamber is smaller than that into the barrels, against which they rest or slide, and are large enough to receive the shot or balls to be used. The chamber itself contains a cavity sufficiently large to hold a proper charge of powder. It is covered with a flat plate of metal, turning on a pin at one corner, and shutting against another pin at the corner below, to keep it in its place. This cover is of the same size with the body of the chamber. Behind this chamber a screw is placed, turning into a thick piece of metal corresponding in position to the breech-pin of the common gun. The head of the screw is large enough to admit of receiving a small handle or pin, which projects under the barrel so far as to admit of being moved with ease by the finger. A space is cut large enough to admit of turning the screw partly round by moving the pin from one side to the other across the barrel. By this means the screw is made to press hard against the chamber, and to hold it firmly in its place, or, by turning in the opposite directions, to leave the chamber so loose that it can slide out easily. The barrel may be mounted on a stock or carriage, and furnished with the common lock.

In loading the gun above described the chamber is slipped out. The shot or balls to be used are poured or placed in the holes on the outside of the front plate of the chamber, and pressed into them by the finger. The cover is then turned open and the powder poured into the chamber, which is prevented from running through the holes by the shot which fills them. The cover is again closed, the chamber slipped down into the mortise of the barrel, the percussion-cap placed on the tube, the screw turned up so that the head presses the chamber hard against the lower ends of the small barrels, and the gun is then ready to be discharged.

In the pistol, instead of the sliding chamber, the main barrel filled with the small barrels may be made to screw off. The holder ends of the boxes of the small barrels are sufficiently hollowed out to receive the shot or ball to be used, which is pressed into each. Below these ends a chamber is left for powder, and a thread is cut on the outside of the exterior of the barrel, which screws into a thread cut on the inside of the breech. When the chamber is filled with powder the barrel is screwed on and is ready for use.

In the cannon the chamber may be constructed like that described in the gun, and when loaded may be discharged by a match or lock.

The exterior barrel and the small barrels and chambers may be made of steel, iron, brass, or other metal, and of such size, length, and peculiar form as may best suit the use to which they are intended. Such variations in strength and thickness may be adopted as con-

KOFFLER, ADAM

Arrived in Wachovia N. Carolina November 14, 1762, Died December 1791
Br. Beck has asked Br. Boggs to consider, if it would not be good to carry on the gun forge here. Br. Beck would believe that he and Br. Koffler are able to do this kind of work, and that he has talked this matter over with Br. Koffler already. Both Brethern have been questioned about this matter in the Coollegium, Br. Beck presented the statement just the same as above, Br. Koffler, however, thought that the thing would be a little more difficult. He promised, however, though he actually does not like this type of work, to do the best he could. After a long consideration and discussion we decided to let Br. Beck take over all the inventory belonging to the gun forge that Joseph Miller relinquished and let his things be worked in the Brothers House.

Arrived at Salem December 18, 1781, died in Fayittville Oct. 8, 1821. The single Brethren report that Br. Loesch, who recently came from Pennsylvania, will work as a locksmith for the, and the former grind stone mill can be fitted up for his work shop. It will be well that for the present he does as little work as possible on guns. December 28, 1781. Br. Jacob Loesch shall not do any more gun work at present, as otherwise he will be constantly called on for that work for the public and it will draw too many soldiers to the town. March 5, 1782. Br. Jacob Loesch asked whether he may now begin his gun work. At present there seems no danger that his work would be required for regular troops, or lead to quartering arms for the militia if they be called out. The Collegium therefore has no objections. Crooking Gun Stocks. Francis D. Poyas has the pleasure of informing the public at large, that he has in operation, a late invente mode of CROOKING GUN STOCKS. Any Gun being too straight in the breech, may be brought exactly to suit the eye without the least injury. If it does them not exactly as stated, he will receive nothing for his trouble, and will make all damages good. He would also state that he carries on the GUNSMITH BUSINESS, as usual, at No. 17 Meeting Street, where all orders will be punctually attended to, and with dispatch. He promises as good work as can be done in the city of Charleston, and trusts he will continue to merit a share of the public patronage.

POYAS, FRANCIS D.

South Carolina

1826

Mr. Jno Schirer, in a late advertisement states that several persons have clandestinely discovered the means by which he manages to crook Gun Stocks, and have tried the same without success. Fully convinced that this rebuke was intended for me, I take this method of informing the public, I served a regular apprenticeship with Mr. Shirer, and from him learned the invaluable secret (steam) to bend a piece of wood, and have used it for his advantage while with him; and as in my indentures he pledges himself to initiate me into all the arts and mysteries of the trade. I feel myself of full liberty to use any and all the means acquired whilst with him, for my own advantage. The said Patent was not obtained until recently, so that the said clandestine means have not therefore been used. FRS. D. POYAS.

 Notice, I have remaining on hand some old Guns, Pistols, and Gunlocks, which were brought to my Gunsmith shop to be repaired; some of them have been in my care for four or five years past. I therefore give notice, that if the owners do not come and pay the charges on the same, before the last day of June next, I shall put them to public sale, in order to pay myself and get them off my hands as I have given over the business to Charles Shnyder, who carrie on the Gunsmith's business for himself in my Shop, Baltzer Shaeffer.
 N. B. I have also on hand, some new Riffle Guns, which I will sell as low as they can be bought in any part of Pennsylvania for Cash or produce. B. S.
